Taiwan teacher nearly became, a victim of forced organ harvesting, during a medical check-up in Shanghai

June 14, 2026] (Epoch Times reporter Yuan Shigang, Kaohsiung, Taiwan)

Ms. Cai, worked as a children's English teacher, recounted that she went to Shanghai for work in May 2016. Before leaving, she had undergone a medical examination at a hospital in Taiwan, and her company told her that the report would be sent directly to China, so she hadn't even seen it herself. After arriving in Shanghai, her company claimed that a medical examination was required before the authorities would issue a work visa. She went to the Shanghai Jiahui International Hospital for another medical examination. Within a month, she underwent two blood tests and full-body examinations, the most important of which was to obtain an AIDS report.

Ms. Cai said that in her second year of work, the company offered free full-body health checkups as part of employee benefits, which were not mandatory. She went for the checkup at the invitation of a Taiwanese colleague. Afterwards, the doctor told her, "Your heart isn't good," and that she had symptoms of arrhythmia, repeatedly suggesting that need seek treatment in Shanghai. Because of the high work pressure at the time, she was discussing her resignation with her supervisor. Ms. Cai thought it was normal for her to have health problems and didn't suspect anything. Even thought, she could use this as a reason to resign.

In 2018, Ms. Cai formally submitted her resignation to the company. Between July and August of the same year received a notification letter from the Shanghai Municipal State Taxation Bureau, claiming that she had tax issues and requiring her to handle them in person at the counter. Since personal income tax for Taiwanese working in China is usually withheld and paid by the employing company, she was puzzled as to why she was being notified directly. When she inquired about the matter with the head office staff, their reaction also made her feel suspicious. "They didn't even dare to look at her and just said they didn't know.

Ms. Cai suspected the notification letter was a scam and ignored it. However, a week later, she received a text message from the local government threatening her that if she refused to go to the State Taxation Administration, she would never be allowed to leave China. One day around noon, she was forced go to the Shanghai Taxation Bureau. The clerk entered her information into the computer, typed a few words, and printed out a document stating that the tax payable was zero. They then told her, "It's all right, you can go now." The whole process took only about 10 minutes.

After leaving the National Taxation Bureau, she went to a Huaxia Bank branch in Putuo District to withdraw money. As soon as she entered, the bank manager approached her, as if he had known she would be there. He was holding a document and asked her to fill it out. In addition to collecting her personal information, the document also included detailed information such as the names and addresses of all her family members in Taiwan. Although she questioned the document on the spot, the manager said very firmly, "You can't leave until you fill it out today." It was then that she began to suspect that the CCP Party government was targeting her.

Based on this experience, Ms. Cai suspects that a Communist Party member among her colleagues is following her. She wants to leave China as soon as possible.

She said: "As long as you work for 5 months, the company will provide you with a return ticket to Taiwan, when she leaves at that time." It was the National Day holiday, and the free round-trip ticket home was one of the benefits. She originally wanted to take the opportunity to return to Taiwan, but the company asked her to return the round-trip ticket for the holiday first, then book another ticket for her to return to Taiwan after leaving the company. However, the company claimed that tickets were hard to book during the holiday and could not guarantee when there would be a ticket available.

Despite that, she immediately booked her flight through a travel website. Suspecting that someone in her company was colluding with the CCP Party to prevent her from leaving, she dared not tell anyone when she was leaving the country. On the first day of the long weekend, she went straight to the airport, not daring to waste a moment on the way, and only felt relieved after boarding on the plane. After returning to Taiwan, she consulted many leading cardiologists and underwent numerous thorough examinations, all of which showed that her heart was perfectly healthy.

However, the matter did not end there. Ms. Cai said that the year after returning to Taiwan (2019), she went to work in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam. Due to business needs, she continued to use the Chinese messaging app WeChat. One day she received a message from the Beijing government claiming that she was involved in a crime and asking her to return to China to cooperate with the investigation. After being frightened, she wanted to empty her WeChat wallet and delete her account, but even WeChat customer service replied that she had to go to China in person to do so.

She worked in Vietnam for less than a year when the COVID-19 pandemic broke out, prompting her to return to Taiwan. She remained perplexed by this series of experiences, suspecting a connection to her former Communist Party colleague in Shanghai, but she always feeling that things were more complex than they appeared. It was not until 2024, after watching the documentary "State Organs," that she realized some of the content resonated with her own experiences, she understood that it was related to her "heart condition initial case".

Ms. Cai had planned to take on translation work in Taiwan. She had translated a document for a translation agency in northern Taiwan, but the deal fell through because the agency did not like her style. But years later, the same agency suddenly contacted her through a job bank website, inviting her to Shanghai to participate in a translation competition. They even emphasized that airfare and accommodation would be covered, but she was too afraid to go to China again.

Ms. Cai originally trusted the environment in China and felt that there was nothing wrong with China unifying with Taiwan. She said that at the time, her monthly salary in Shanghai exceeded RMB 13,000 (about NT$60,000), and she lived in a high-end residence provided by her company. The company also covered her basic electricity bill. Before leaving Shanghai, she lived in the COSCO Two Bays City in Putuo District and often went to Hongkou Dream Dragon to relieve stress after work in the evening. In addition, three female members of her family had married inland Chinese husbands, and herself had also thought about getting married and settling down in China.

Ms. Cai said she could understand those pro-China Taiwanese internet celebrities who made videos praising China, because she was living a similar life back then, eating cakes that cost 400 NT dollars each. This is one of the reasons why Taiwanese people have fallen into this abyss. If she had not experienced these things, she might have become a "little pink" now.

She revealed that during her time working in Shanghai, her company encouraged Taiwanese employees to apply for 14-digit Chinese identity cards. The company's Taiwanese supervisor stated that the Beijing government would provide several free travel tickets annually. Fortunately, at the time, she felt the tickets were too cheap and unattractive that she did not want to give up her Taiwanese identity for a few tickets.

She emphasized that she hopes to use her own experience to awaken Taiwanese people who still harbour illusions about the CCP.

CCP propaganda told, Mountain children that American people eat human flesh

Children in a mountainous area of China asked American tourists if they ate people. The tourists were shocked.

New Tang Dynasty Television, April 13, 2026

The CCP's decades-long anti-American propaganda targeting ordinary citizens has poisoned the minds of many mountain children. Recently, a video of a rural boy asking an American tourist a question has once again brought the absurdity of this propaganda to the forefront.

A well-known Chinese influencer, "Gongzi Shen," posted a video on the X platform showing a group of children surrounding an American tourist and asking him questions, near a school in a mountainous area. They asked "Do Americans eat people?" he answered, "No, no." The American tourist explained, I eat the same things as you.

"In outside world people said: Chinese people eat dog and cat meat. But here CCP instil in children the idea that Americans eat human flesh. One of the children added, "Isn't there a guy named Epstein? Didn't he eat people?" "There's a Lolita Island."

The footage shows that the children were not malicious; they were simply recounting information they had been given, as if they were trying to uncover some mysterious secret.

Online, there are propaganda videos showing mainland children receiving "red education". At Zhiyong Kindergarten in Xinmi City, Zhengzhou, Henan Province, a group of four- and five-year-old children were required to wear cardboard signs with the words "explosive pack" on their backs, simulating self-destruction heroes on the battlefield.

School children forced to wear signs on their backs that read "bomb pack."

During the National Day holidays, many kindergartens in China assigned children and parents a craft project to make "bombs" with national flags attached. A so-called "patriotic parent-child activity" held by Jinshan Kindergarten in Jiangxi, a little boy was seen holding a wooden toy gun and saying, "I'm going to take this gun to fight the Japanese."

American journalist accused of being an illegal CCP agent, appears in court

Epoch Times, May 26, 2026

An American journalist named Thomas Weir Pauken II (pen name Tom McGregor), who lived in China for over 10 years and worked for several CCP state media outlets, was arrested by the FBI in February on suspicion of illegally acting as a CCP agent.

According to affidavits submitted by the FBI to the court, he has operated under the guidance of Cathy, a female contact for the Chinese Ministry of State Security (MSS), since 2019.

One of the main focuses of his mission was to contact a relevant person who might work for the Trump administration. He told the FBI that Cathy told him that his intelligence reports would be sent directly to CCP leader Xi Jinping.

FBI agents stated that Cathy arranged for him to take polygraph tests in 2022, 2023. During the test, he was asked whether he had worked for the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

The affidavit details that he travelled between the U.S. and China multiple times, with travel expenses covered by CCP. Cathy paid him about $8,000 for each trip to the U.S. He worked at Chinese state media such as China Radio International, China Central Television, China Global Television Network (CGTN), and Xinhua News Agency. In 2019, he published a book on the US-China trade war, claiming to offer a neutral perspective.

Pauken has a distinguished background; his father, Tom Pauken Sr., a senior Republican politician from Texas, served as an official in the Reagan administration and was chairman of the Texas Republican Party.

Swedish Chip Expert Died Suddenly in China

Epoch Times, September 2, 2026

In the obituary released by the Guangdong Greater Bay Area Integrated Circuit and System Application Research Institute, Henry Homayoun Adamson, the institute's chief scientist and director of the Optoelectronic Integrated Circuit R&D Centre, passed away in Shanghai on August 12 at the age of 63.

Adamson received the “CCP Party” Award in 2023 that recognized foreign experts working in China. A Swedish national and renowned research expert in nanoelectronics, nanophononics, thermoelectric materials, and infrared sensors. After receiving his PhD in semiconductor materials from Linköping University in Sweden in 1996, Adamsson served as a senior researcher at the Royal Institute of Technology in Stockholm.

In 2012, he became a visiting professor at the Chinese Academy of Sciences. Then in 2016, he returned to under the CCP Party’s “Thousand Talents Program” and became a researcher at the Institute of Microelectronics of the Chinese Academy of Sciences, where he studied semiconductor materials made of germanium and related compounds.

The Program was associated with the theft of technology or research from Western countries. Promoted by CCP to attract high-level overseas talent, triggered strong concerns and strict scrutiny from the United States and other Western countries regarding national security, intellectual property protection, and academic integrity.

In August 2019, the Guangdong Greater Bay Area Integrated Circuit and System Application Research Institute was established in Guangzhou, with Adamson serving as its chief scientist.

In a 2023 interview with the official Chinese media outlet Science and Technology Daily, he stated that his research focused on combining electronic and optical technologies.

Chinese Communist Party, uses drones to track, and abduct Falun Gong practitioners

Epoch Times. Published: July 11, 2026, 12:14 PM

Recently, Minghui.org reported that Wang Ruiping, a 72-year-old Falun Gong practitioner from Dalian, Liaoning Province, was released on bail at the end of May after being abducted. Police subsequently deployed drones to monitor her. The CCP has used various methods to monitor Falun Gong practitioners, and in recent years has added high-tech drones for surveillance. There are reported cases, monitoring Falun Gong practitioners as early as 2020, using photos taken by drones as "evidence" to frame them. During the pandemic, drones were used to investigate the activities of practitioners at home or about so that the police could harass them or carry abduct them.

The Chinese authorities panicked about people seeing the truth of the evil being done by them. Xianning City Radio and Television Bureau in Hubei Province used drones to locate and block satellite dishes to prevent them from watching New Tang Dynasty Television (NTDTV), located in the United States. They used drones to fly over communities, searching for satellite dishes in people's homes. Once a target was found, they would send people to steal the dish without informing of the homeowner.

In 1998, CCP proposed the "Golden Shield Project," known as the "National Public Security Work Informatization Project." Was implemented in 2003 and completed the network firewall in 2006, costing a total of 6 billion RMB. In effect, it established a powerful "cyber police."

It interferes with, monitors, censors, and blocks the telephone, internet, and other communication activities of all citizens within mainland China. After its establishment, many Falun Gong practitioners were subjected to long-term surveillance by the CCP police, and were subsequently abducted, illegally detained, and sentenced.

The CCP's surveillance system also includes the "Skynet Project," an information technology project jointly launched in 2011 by the Political and Legal Affairs Commission, the Ministry of Public Security, and the Ministry of Industry and Information Technology. It connects over 20 million surveillance cameras nationwide and incorporates big data and artificial intelligence technologies such as facial recognition for police use.

In 2016, the CCP extended the "Skynet Project." to become a country, township and village-level governance system. The goal is to achieve "full coverage and control, by the network-wide sharing, 24/7 availability, by 2020. Many practitioners and opposers of CCCP, have been abducted and detained by police after their identities were verified when purchasing airline or train tickets or entering train stations and hotels.

On June 22, 2024, the World Organization Investigated the Persecution of Falun Gong (WOIPFG) published its "Investigation Report on the CCP's Three-Dimensional State Surveillance System," exposing the dark secrets of the CCP's comprehensive surveillance to persecution of Falun Gong practitioners and the entire population since it began persecuting Falun Gong in 1999.
